prejudiced over his destiny. The hostility, however, to any conservative influences prevented Colonel Stoyell from obtaining even a respectable support.

We repeat that the elections of Paris have been to an appeal to the moral force of the population and a dependence upon legal methods of influencing public opinion. It is of less consequence what candidate is chosen, provided a large minority feel safe in supporting an opposite opinion. The danger of Paris has always been in the overwhelming preponderance of a successful candidate, and then, as resulting from it, the discouragement and abandonment of the defeated party. When a great body of men can be brought together to uphold a grand idea, and when opposition to those in the ascendancy is sufficiently powerful to hold it in check, we have the first element of settled government, and the first step towards abandoning the course of revolutions.

The defeated party learn to wait with hope, and their triumphant opponents nevertheless find it necessary to count them as an established power of the State. "Her Majesty's Opposition" is a reality in England, and only less respected as a necessary element in a constitutional system than the Government itself. This sense of power may in a small colony like this prove salutary, but it is a gross error when the opposition carries on its business by mutual concession, by general understanding, and by a deferential intercourse between the great parties in the State. It is only when France shall learn this confidence in the electorate that there will be any prospect of any form of government continuing.

The absurd proceedings of the Monarchical party have greatly compromised their cause. The childish quarrels which have divided them have reduced them to total incapacity. Even the Orleans have been obliged to France with a compromising prominence, and the sage advice of M. Thiers has been frustrated by insisting upon the ancient opinions. He has been declared unfaithful to the Republic which he from the first promised to defend against the monarchists, as well as all other theoretical partisans; and no doubt his great experience and good sense led him to perceive the time had arrived when his neutrality of position could no longer maintain.

Since the elections have taken place, and before the resignation of M. Thiers, the journals of London, as well as those of France, seem to interpret the verdict of the electors with more cheerfulness, and they have even asserted that the defeat of the ex-Minister was of little significance. But the choice of extreme Republicanism, and some who have been implicated in the disorders which have been declared crimes, seems to diminish this confidence. The Radical party declare that "France revives ever strong and generous, ever faithful to the indomitable spirit of the revolution which has constituted the advanced guard of the rest of humanity."

Some, indeed, are told to begin to regret the vote for the Red Republican candidate. This assurance, however, comes with little force after a grand defeat which includes not only the late Minister, but many other eminent men.

What will be the course of the Germans in the prospect of affairs has been a very anxious speculation. The right to interfere of course is no longer based upon the debt of France, but there is no doubt that it will look with jealousy on the return of Gambetta and his party to power, should that event take place. The reputation of the Duc de Broglie stands very high, and so long as he retains office under General MacMahon he will command the confidence of Europe. But the difficulty is to entertain that confidence in the presence of the recent elections. The new Government has, however, continued for some weeks, and this is an event to be recorded.

In speaking some time since of the discoveries of M. Roland in connection with silk farming, some unintentional injustice was done to Dr. Chavannes. This gentleman, ex-Professor of Zoology at the Academy of Lausanne, and practising as a physician, was the first to advise that the diseased European worm could only be brought back to a healthy and productive state by introducing to it insect conditions, and was the first to show the results of the regenerative system he proposed. M. Roland, with that magnanimity which is always observable in great men, disowns the credit of being the originator of the system, and claims only to have developed it. This he recently stated with explicitness before the Society of Arts, in London, on the occasion of reading a paper in explanation of the process of "Education," which is shown in all its phases in the garden of the International Exhibition, under the auspices of the Committee of the Sericulture Department, presided over by Sir James Gordon.

It is remarkable that the Bonapartists and Legitimists were united, although their joint numbers do not appear to have been very formidable. Some of the placards show their sympathies in their red complexion, and the general character of the proceedings testifies the hostility of the majority to the Government of the late President, M. Thiers. The voting seems to be accepted by all parties as a fatal verdict on the Monarchical party, and as definitely (if not setting aside its pretensions indefinitely) postponing them.

The principal London newspapers declare that the only course possible now for those who are friends of order is to support the Republic. The defeated ex-Minister has been recognized as a decided Republican by his own party, but his declaration to this effect has evidently failed to secure the confidence of the party who profess especially to uphold the principle of the Republic. Gambetta seems to have exercised a preponderating influence.

It is a remarkable circumstance that the Conservative candidate, who polled less than 30,000 votes, supplied the most serious imputations on the Bonapartist Administration. Colonel Stoyell, it will be remembered, sent the Imperial Government those warning despatches which have since become so celebrated. His faithful reports with respect to the prospects of France in the contest with Germany might have saved the country had they received the slightest attention. But it is
